

Great Smoky Mountains National Park (TN,NC)

Logan Boldon grew up on the coast of Lake Erie in northeast Ohio. Visiting local, state, and national parks as a youth fostered his keen desire to learn more about the world around him. Logan studied Biology at Dalton State College and has recently embarked on the journey of obtaining a Masters in Environmental Education from Slippery Rock University. Between studies, he has volunteered, interned, and worked at several parks in various capacities. From rehabilitating animals for release back into the world, to leading tours of civil war forts, his passion for both natural and historical resources is evident in all he does. Logan is deeply interested in fostering meaningful connections between people and the resources inherent in our public lands to foster stewardship and conservation ethics. He believes that helping people truly understand the important role National Parks play in preserving our natural and cultural heritage is essential since people only protect what they value, and only value what they understand.
